The author, Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Bunbury, was born in 1775. He joined the army in 1793, and served in a variety of campaigns, including the Peninsular War and the Waterloo Campaign. He retired from the army in 1830, and died in 1860.

Bunbury's memoirs are divided into two parts. The first part covers his experiences in the army, while the second part covers his life after he retired. The first part of the book is particularly interesting, as it provides a detailed account of life in the army at that time.

Bunbury describes the daily routine of a soldier, the food he ate, the clothes he wore, and the punishments he received. He also describes the battles he fought in, and the comrades he served with. The second part of the book is less interesting, as it mainly covers Bunbury's life after he retired from the army.
