The Net Rochester Riot was a major uprising that took place in Rochester, New York, in 1839. The riot was sparked by the high price of flour, and it quickly spread to other parts of the city. Over the course of several days, rioters looted and burned businesses, and they clashed with law enforcement. The riot was eventually quelled, but it left a lasting impact on the city.

Causes of the Riot

The Net Rochester Riot was caused by a number of factors, including the high price of flour, the economic depression of the 1830s, and the influx of Irish immigrants to the city. The price of flour had been rising steadily for several years, and by 1839, it had reached a point where many people could not afford to buy it. The economic depression of the 1830s had also left many people unemployed and desperate.

In addition to these economic factors, the influx of Irish immigrants to Rochester also played a role in the riot. The Irish were often seen as outsiders and a threat to jobs. This resentment helped to fuel the violence of the riot.

The Riot

The Net Rochester Riot began on July 14, 1839, when a group of women attacked a flour mill. The women were angry about the high price of flour, and they demanded that the millers lower their prices. The millers refused, and the women began to loot the mill. The riot quickly spread to other parts of the city, and by nightfall, rioters were looting and burning businesses throughout the city.

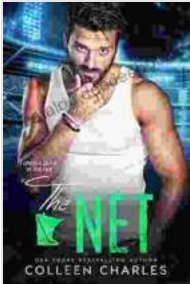

Law enforcement was unable to control the rioting, and the mayor was forced to call in the militia. The militia eventually quelled the riot, but not before the rioters had caused significant damage to the city.

Aftermath of the Riot

The Net Rochester Riot had a lasting impact on the city. The riot led to the passage of new laws that regulated the price of flour and other essential commodities. The riot also led to the creation of a new police force in Rochester. The new police force was more effective at preventing and controlling riots, and it helped to make Rochester a safer city.
